Your digestive system is about more than what foods you eat. A well-functioning digestive system is important to overall health and well-being.

More than 50 million Americans visit their health care providers each year due to digestive concerns. As people age, the level of digestive enzymes in their bodies may diminish, which can lead to poor digestion. This can have many negative effects on the body that may include stress on the immune system, decreased energy levels, and a lowered ability to properly absorb nutrients.

Don’t let poor digestion interfere with your day-to-day living. Creating healthy habits, along with supporting your diet with supplements, may help to support your digestion. Talk to your health care professional and develop a plan that’s right for you.

Over 70 percent of your immune system is in your digestive tract, making healthy digestion key in overall wellness.
